respected. An implicit requirement of this right is an equal degree of power in sexual partners, and where such power-equality does not exist, consensual sex is impossible. Accordingly, the author rules out, as always wrong, sexual contact between child and adult, patient and doctor, student and teacher, parishioner and pastor, client and counsellor, not because sex as such is wrong in such relationships but because the disparity of power in them makes free consent a virtual impossibility.

The pastoral half of the book deals with what ministers need to know and how they can help both victims and perpetrators of sexual violence. The author stresses the importance of competence and candor in counselling, the need for the church community to be supportive of victims, and has some excellent insights into the religious dimensions of pastoral care, particularly in regard to God's Will and suffering. One crucial point is that children who report sexual abuse to adults should be believed; indeed they should even be told beforehand that they will be believed. The book concludes with some comments on pornography which the author usefully distinguishes from mere sexually explicit materials, returning once again to the difference between sexual violence and sexual activity.

The book is well worth reading, not only for those engaged directly with problems of sexual violence, but for parents, teachers and pastors generally. It strikes this reviewer that there is one confusion in the book worth comment here. For years rape, incest and child abuse were considered to be sexual sins. Recently, thanks largely to the contribution of women, the violent nature of such offenses has been stressed. The author notes early in the book that we must learn to take seriously both the violent nature of such acts and their sexual nature. Yet in working out her sexual ethic she focuses exclusively on free intention and equality of power. In doing so she is not altogether mistaken, but she ignores the fact that she is talking about sex and not simply about human relationships in general. It is not simply the abuse of a power relationship, for instance, that makes sex an inappropriate activity between teacher and student. Also involved is a misuse of sex itself, a use of it to celebrate what isn't true.

Finally a word about overstatement. I do not know of any place in the Christian tradition of thought on human sexuality where it was taught that men were not responsible for controlling their sexual feelings or that "sexual activity inside of marriage is considered right no matter what the circumstances." (pp. 28–29). Whatever shortcomings exist in the Christian tradition of sexual teaching, the failure to insist upon both male and female chastity is not one of them. Fortune's book consistently overstates what may reasonably be expected from the tradition. But it does point us to the importance of a deeper reflection upon the problems of sexual abuse and the conditions of free consent. In this regard the book is a welcome corrective to an often too-silent tradition. •
